the house, the writer says, "This dear old house with its wide hall and cirular stairway, large square rooms and beautiful old furniture is something one reads about. There is the long avenue of naples leading up to the house and a fircular drive at the entrance. Many of the trees are lindens. There are birds of ill varieties, wrens, orioles, robins and mocking birds filling the air with their tory book garden it is with the long aveue of box hedge and winding paths bordered with box, perfectly fascinating with

A charming young woman of this city nuch petted in this town and she knew there were lots of nice men in the different offices and business houses who would be olite enough to come to her house and deem it a privilege. For her part she was fired of the feeling of canul, which most of the young men exhibited and take no pains to conceal. She knew that it would e pleasant for some of her friends to know some different men and none the less pleasant for the men to know some of er girl friends. It is not known whether has started in on her round, but if she does what she threatens and finds it as agreeable as she anticipates, it will be well for the "society" men to look to heir laurels. The novelty of a nice new beau is something the society girl cannot

Miss Louise Garrard, of Clarksburg, W. Va., formerly a favorite society girl of this city, and who was a prominent member of the Dramatic Club, has dramatized a story which she has named "An Unexpected ' a short one-act play, which has been published. While Miss Garrard lived here she dramatized a story which was successfully produced. Miss Garrard is a capable amateur participant in plays, and has had considerable experience in managing plays. The "Unexpected Fare" is cleverly written. It has a cast of six characters, five young ladies and one young man, and takes about a half hour to perform. The ladies of the first circle of the Fourth Presbyterian Church gave a very pretty reception at the home of Mr. and Mrs. George I. Matson, in Morton Place, on Friday evening. It | the infant's chances for life. was an emotion too full and satisfying for audible expression, but audible expression was not needed. Her expression filled the eyes, it caught the breath, it gave activity and springiness to the step, and it heightened her color. It was infectious, and soon attracted the attention of all the adults about the station. And yet the girl was not herself in ill health, but was only there because the Charity Organization visitors had found in the home of the girl a babe that was in serious need of attention. The children belong to a downtown janitor who lost his wife a few months ago, and has since been keeping house by the help of his sixteen-year-old boy and this nine-yearold girl. The consequence was that the baby was being unconsciously neglected. Complaint had come from neighbors that the babe was dying from neglect, and Mrs. Haines, a visitor, was sent to investigate. She found the babe, now about a year old. lying in a hammock on a ragged piece of quilt, and moaning in its suffering. Arrangements were made to take the child to the hospital at Fairview. When the visitor called for the baby, she asked the sister if it was ready. "Are you going to take baby away?" was asked in sobbing tones. "Yes," said Mrs. Haines, "I am going to take baby where it can get well and The girl burst into tears as she prepared to part with the small piece of humanity which had been her care in her imperfect pain and would not eat.

"Throw it away," "Baby don't want it." But instead of throwing it away the girl slipped it down by her side. It was a sign of hunger which did not escape the kindly eye of the visitor. As the ride proceeded and the babe felt the warm, strong arm it nestled down in a peace and quiet it had not known since its own mother had pressed it to her bosom. At the station the baby was taken to the nurses, who bathed it and dressed it in clean clothes. Its little body bore the signs of neglect. Its ribs showed as plainly as the corrugations of a washboard. Inquiry of the sister brought out that the baby had been fed bread lipped in coffee and occasionally meat gravy. It was now fed with fresh, wholesome milk, and soon was in a peaceful sleep. Then it was laid upon a soft pillow in a hammock on the hospital porch, where tributor to the support of this institution, if | pure air and quiet began at once to increase "Go look at the baby," was said to the sister after she, too, had been fed, and she could bring herself from wonder to listen to was said to her. She ran to the hammock, went down on her knees to press kisses upon the baby, muttering "Oh, how sweet." She had never visited the park but once before in her life. The idea of wide stretches of land without houses, and nothing but trees and fields to be seen was so new to her that her soul filled with a new conception of the world. For the rest of the day she seemed dazed by the wealth of happiness that so suddenly had come to her. The only thing that could divert her thought from the beauty of her surroundings was the baby, which she visited as often as allowed by the nurses. Her wonderment increased to widest astonishment when she saw the clean, snug cradle where baby was to sleep that night. When it came time to go home she was willing to go without the baby, but could not snatch kisses enough to do her until she should see the little one again, as she hoped, on

The babe remained several days and began to show improvement from the very irst. The father, however, grew alarmed, lest his child was to be taken in charge by the society which watches the welfare of neglected children and he secured a place or the girl and the infant in the Orphans' Home by paying a certain amount each week for their board. He was able to pay it but not able to give his children the care they needed while he was at work. Baby will still take an occasional airing at the station, but under charge of the man-agers of the Orphans' Home.

hoping, yet knowing that her skirt wouldn't

The old axiom that pluck and industry will win success in the end seems to be verified in the career of Walter Damrosch, the young musician, who for some years past has been endeavoring to popularize the better sort of music in New York. The young man has met obstacle after obstacle. but he has persevered and finally it would seem that he will win in his efforts. Certainly his pluck and persistency are worthy of high praise. He has had a small circle of warm friends, who have supported him, and the encouragement of his wife, who is the daughter of James G. Blaine, has meant much to him. She invariably attends her husband's concerts and in every way that she can she helps him. Damrosch is a young man who looks younger than he really is, owing to the fact that he wears no beard. Indeed, a beard would disfigure his clear-cut, intellectual face. He was subjected to much unnecessary criticism when he began his present work, but the public has now come to see that he is engaged in a useful as well as an artistic mission and his darkest days appear to have been left behind. Still, as yet, he is winning more fame than fortune.

Duncan Edwards, in Scribner's. There is not anything brutal about it. It is a business with the young fellows, who sit there, with naked backs, and clean, white, hard flesh, and easy muscles, who are being rubbed and fanned, and who are having their tongues scraped with a "strigil" and pressed with lemons. There is nothing ugly about them. They come up to each other smiling, and sometimes take each other's hands in both their own to show they feel no ill will. When you have seen it all, and even, perhaps, one of the contestants a bit "groggy" at the end, you haven't seen anything immoral or bad-or brutal.
